DSM-5® Clinical Cases

Introduction

---

Robert Haskell, M.D.

In its approach to mental illness across the lifetime of a patient, DSM-5 naturally begins with the neurodevelopmental disorders. As a group, these disorders are usually first diagnosed in infancy, childhood, or adolescence. Individually, these disorders have undergone a mix of pruning, reorganization, and clarification, including one of DSM-5's most controversial changes—to the definition of and diagnostic criteria for autism.

In DSM-5, autism spectrum disorder describes patients previously divided among autistic disorder, Asperger's disorder, childhood disintegrative disorder, Rett's disorder, and pervasive developmental disorder not otherwise specified. These are no longer considered to be separate clinical entities. The new criteria include 1) persistent and pervasive deficits in social communication and social interaction and 2) restricted, repetitive patterns of behavior, interests, and activities. As now defined, autism spectrum disorder (ASD) can be subcategorized by the presence or absence of intellectual impairment and/or an associated medical condition. In addition, the identification of three severity levels helps clarify the need for additional social or occupational services. For example, a patient requiring "very substantial support" might display extreme behavioral inflexibility or might possess 20 words of intelligible speech.

Attention-deficit/hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) continues to be subdivided into two symptom dimensions (inattention and hyperactivity/impulsivity), with a core requirement being the presence of at least six symptoms from either or both of the two dimensions. For example, inattention might be noted by the presence of such behaviors as making careless mistakes, failing to follow through with homework, and losing books. Criteria for hyperactivity/impulsivity include fidgetiness, impatience, and garrulousness. The diagnosis of ADHD is generally incomplete without inclusion of dimensional specifiers (predominantly inattentive, predominantly hyperactive/impulsive, or combined). Several of these symptoms must have been present prior to age 12, a change from DSM-IV's requirement that symptoms causing impairment be present prior to age 7. Another change is a reduction in the number of symptomatic criteria for adults from six to five within a particular dimension. These latter two changes reflect evidence that "loosening" criteria allows for identification of people who have
