

The Use of Cohesive Devices in ESL Students' Writing Research Paper

Introduction

Language has multiple functions in society. It is generally believed that its main function is to "communicate information" (Gee 2014, p. 2). People need language to transfer and receive information. It becomes particularly important when there is a necessity to communicate a foreign language. The scope of foreign language teaching comprises skills of speaking, listening, reading, and writing. One of the primary concerns of teachers of English as a second language (ESL) is the formation of efficient writing skills among their students.

Teaching writing is probably one of the most complicated tasks because it presupposes not only the knowledge of vocabulary but also the use of grammar. Within the last decades, many studies were dedicated to the issue of the significance of linguistic features in foreign language writing proficiency (Crossley & McNamara 2012). Wall (cited in Rassouli & Abbasvandi 2013, p. 15) claimed that writing skill "ranges from mechanical control to creativity, with good grammar, knowledge of the subject matter, awareness of stylistic convention and various mysterious factors in between." One of the factors which influence the development of writing skill among ESL students is the use of cohesive devices also called linking words or discourse markers. They are considered the most difficult skills for foreign English learners (Rahman 2013). Current research investigates the issue of the use of cohesive devices in written discourse by ESL students in one of the United Arab Emirates' school.

Theoretical Framework

Researches dedicated to the discourse-level text features try to analyze the approaches of effective writing teaching. One of the most meaningful discourse theories in ESL writing has been the cohesion theory of Michael Halliday and Ruqaiya Hasan (McCarthy 1991). Halliday's framework "emphasizes the social functions of language and the thematic and informational structure of speech and writing" (McCarthy 1991, p. 6). However, its application to the teaching of reading and writing of English as a second language has been much criticized. Halliday and Hasan's framework became basic for many types of research about cohesion and coherence in ESL/EFL writing (Jafarpur 1991; Johns 1980; Johnson 1992; Zhang 2000; Harnett 1989, cited in Ghasemi 2013).

The researches findings were similar and contradictory at the same time. Some studies revealed no significant difference in the application of cohesive devices in good and weak writings (Johnson 1992; Zhang 2000, cited in Ghasemi 2013). Other results proved that there is a distinction in the use of cohesive devices between highly rated essays and low rated ones (Jafarpur 1991, cited in Ghasemi 2013). Some scholars came to the conclusion that "highly scored compositions contain more cohesion than low scored ones" (Jafarpur 1991, cited in Ghasemi 2013, p. 1616). Moreover, it is generally considered that "highly scored essays include more lexical collocations than do low scored ones" (Johns 1980; Zhang 2000, cited in Ghasemi 2013, p. 1616).

Morgan and Selner (1980, cited in McCarthy 1991) claimed it was too text-oriented and at the same time ignored the importance of schema-theoretical views of text processing as an interactive process between the text and the reader. Carrell (1993, cited in McCarthy 1991) introduces a discussion about the roles of cohesion and coherence in the teaching of reading and writing in English as a second language. However, despite the increase of interest in the issue of cohesion significance to coherence in writing, the existing researches lack a systematic approach to the investigation of cohesion in ESL students' writing.

Literature Review

The concept of cohesion has been a topic for many contemporary types of research. The use of cohesive devices in teaching writing in English as a second language is a separate aspect of these studies. For example, Ghasemi (2013) investigates the use of cohesive devices in second language writings. The article presents the results of the study of the relationship between the use of cohesive devices and the quality of written works of ESL learners. Particular attention is given to the issue of teaching writing to Arab students and their use of cohesion.
