

▲ Aeshna isoceles male. Note the contrasting green eyes.

Identification

General A brown and rufous plain hawker, with largely clear wings and conspicuous green eyes. The yellow triangle on 12 is diagnostic, as are the colour and shape of the thor base. Males patrol marshy ditches, reedy lakesides and other low, calm waters.

Field characters Tot 62–66mm, Ab 47–54mm, Ho 28–35mm. Between A. mixta and A. juncea in size. Entire body is brown and virtually unmarked, apart from a slightly dark crest on the face, two yellow bands on the thorax sides, dark lines on the abdomen and a conspicuous yellow triangle on upperside 12. When mature, the green eyes contrast with the brown body. Wings clear, with dark veins and a diagnostic deep amber patch at the thor base. The all-brown Aeshna grandis is larger and has entirely amber wings, and blue or yellow spots on the sides of the abdomen. The brownish Aeshna cyathiger and A. parthenope can have greenish eyes, but have an unbarred thorax and blue 'saddle' at the abdomen base.

Head characters Male membrane and anal triangle elongated, the latter with three to seven cells (often two and seldom more than four in Aeshna). Male upper appendages more slender than those of other Aeshna, with tooth near base on underside.

Variation Individuals from the southern Balkans eastwards tend to have extended yellow thorax markings with prominent nail-shaped antehumeral stripes. These have been treated as two antehumerals but are probably just paler due to the warmer climate and therefore do not warrant taxonomic status.

Behaviour Unlike most hawks, males frequently perch during patrols.

Occurrence

Range and status Widespread but very local in much of its range, especially in south-west, often common where present. Extends to Central Asia in the east.

Habitat Ditches, marshes, ponds and lakes with rich vegetation. Favours swamps of water-celery (Stratiotes alba) in most of its northern range. Sometimes on running water in the south.

Flight season May to August in most of its range, most abundant in June, earlier than most Aeshna.
