

Compare different research methodologies for health and social care.

The first table will be briefly describing and comparing the different types of research methods including quantitative, qualitative, primary and secondary. There will also be a second table which includes some examples as to how each type of research method can be applied in health and social care.

Quantitative research	Quantitative research is research where the data collected is formatted in numerical form, and so is collected in numbers. Quantitative research is often used when carrying out research regarding economic issues in health and social care, such as how many teenagers are finding themselves on drugs in relation to deprived areas. From carrying out this kind of research, a percentage could be found as to how many teenagers take drugs in deprived areas in comparison to wealthy, developed areas. (McLeod, 2008)
Qualitative research	Qualitative research is research that cannot actually be measured as it is collected in unstructured forms. For example, surveys and questionnaires which require written answers (instead of ticking boxes, which would fall under quantitative research) as well as unstructured interviews. Qualitative research is often used in health and social care when trying to understand how something could be improved. For example, surveys could be given out to patients' in hospitals where they are required to write down their answers so provide a more detailed and personal response. Qualitative research can also be turned into quantitative data if necessary however, as they could collect the qualitative data gathered and count how many people answered the same thing. This could then be turned into (for example) "40% of people surveyed said that they would like to have access to free water in the hospital reception". (McLeod, 2008)
Primary research	Primary research is research that has not been previously gathered. Primary research could include questionnaires, surveys and interviews. Research that has already been carried out by another person cannot be primary research, and it is therefore secondary research because it has already been collected at an earlier date. Primary research is often used in health and social care to find out how things can be improved in environments such as GPs and hospitals, as the research needs to be personal to the practice they are trying to gather research on. (Given, 1995)
Secondary research	Like briefly mentioned, secondary research is a type of research that has already been gathered by another researcher and has
