

Root Anatomy Lab

Root stem leaf lab.doc

Cells in plants are organized into four main tissues—protective, vascular, meristematic, and fundamental. Protective tissue surrounds the outside of a root and the rest of the plant. This tissue is composed of epidermis and/or cork cells. Vascular tissue contains cells which conduct materials such as water, minerals, and food to the organs of the plant. It also provides support. Two of the major vascular tissues are xylem and phloem. Fundamental tissue includes storage areas and cells where food is manufactured. This tissue also provides support. Meristematic tissue is growth tissue. It produces new cells which develop into the other three types of tissues.

In this investigation, you are to observe and identify the various tissues in herbaceous monocot and dicot roots, the area of lateral root origin, and onion root. You are to compare the relative sizes of each cell type observed. You are also to observe and identify primary and secondary roots from different types of root systems.

Procedure

Part A. Herbaceous Monocot and Dicot Roots

Observe the monocot and dicot root slides on low power, then on med or high power of your microscope. For each root, locate and label the epidermis, cortex, endodermis, pith, xylem, pericycle, and phloem (Figure 53-1). Decide whether each cell type is protective, vascular, ground, or meristematic tissue. Compare the relative size of each type of cell.

Part B. Onion Root Tip (Longitudinal Section)

Observe the onion root tip slide on low then medium power. Label the apical meristem (the area where the cells are dividing). Note that the cells are smaller and less developed closer to the meristem and that they elongate and mature as they get older (farther up the root). What is the function of the root cap at the very tip of the root? Sketch what you see.
