

FOREIGN DIRECT INVESTMENT (FDI): DETERMINANTS AND GROWTH EFFECTS IN A SMALL OPEN ECONOMY

Olajide S. Oladipo, York College, The City University of New York (CUNY)

ABSTRACT

In an attempt to attract foreign direct investment, many African countries embarked on various reforms. Nigeria, like many African countries, took some steps towards trade reforms and macroeconomic regime and introduced measures aimed at improving the FDI regulatory framework. In the form of stocktaking, this study examines the determinants of FDI, the causal relationship among factors affecting economic growth in Nigeria, including the formal investigation of the export-led and FDI-led growth hypotheses in Nigeria for the period between 1970 and 2005. We found that Nigeria's potential market size, the degree of export orientation, human capital, providing enabling environment through the provision of infrastructural facilities, and macroeconomic stability are important determinants of FDI flows. Further, our results confirms that foreign direct investment leads to economic growth and that government consumption expenditure, openness to international trade and human capital are complementary to economic growth. Controlling for domestic investment growth as well as other factors, causality tests show support for both the export-led growth and FDI-led growth hypotheses for Nigeria.

INTRODUCTION

Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) has long been a subject of great interest in the field of international development. In an era of volatile flows of global capital, the stability of FDI and its emergence as an important source of foreign capital for developing economies has once again renewed interest in its linkages with sustainable economic growth.

Nigeria, like many developing countries, is in dire need of foreign investment to complement the domestic investment and resources. In addition, the supply side of the Nigerian economy requires a massive injection of foreign resources to generate the necessary increase in output which is required to reduce the rate of inflation, promote growth in the industrial sector and stimulate the acquisition of foreign technology which would further enhance economic growth.

However, Nigeria did not take advantage of the first FDI boom of the late 1980s, primarily because of macroeconomic instability, frequent policy reversals, restrictions on some sectors of FDI and on the repatriation of profits and capital. Considerable amount of FDI flow into Nigeria began after 1986 when some of the restrictions were lifted and infrastructure sectors were opened to private participation (the 1986 adjustment program constitute a bold policy response to attract foreign investors, correct internal and external imbalance). FDI flow into Nigeria has increased rapidly since 1999 due to the privatisation of banks, energy and telecommunication sectors, and gradually improving macroeconomic policy framework. In recent years, FDI represents by far the most important source of external financing for many African countries and Nigeria in particular. In 2005, FDI represented about 35.1 percent of total net GDP in Nigeria.
