Diffusion Through a Membrane

A Laboratory Activity for the Living Environment

Diffusion is an important living process. It allows the cells of an organism to obtain the substances they need to live. It also allows the cells to get rid of the wastes they produce. In this activity, you will observe diffusion through a membrane. You will see how a substance spreads from an area of high concentration to an area of low concentration. Diffusion continues until the substances are evenly distributed. This is called equilibrium. In this activity, you will observe how a substance spreads from an area of high concentration to an area of low concentration.

When a substance spreads from one area to another, it is called diffusion. In this activity, you will observe diffusion through a membrane. You will see how a substance spreads from an area of high concentration to an area of low concentration. Diffusion continues until the substances are evenly distributed. This is called equilibrium.

Living cells are surrounded by a membrane that is made of phospholipids. These phospholipids are made of two parts: a hydrophilic head and a hydrophobic tail. The hydrophilic head is attracted to water, and the hydrophobic tail is repelled by water. This makes the membrane a barrier to water. However, some substances can pass through the membrane. These substances are called small molecules. They can pass through the membrane because they are small enough.

Some parts of the cell membrane are called channels. These channels are made of proteins. They allow some substances to pass through the membrane. These substances are called large molecules. They cannot pass through the membrane because they are too large. However, some large molecules can pass through the membrane if they are small enough.

Objectives

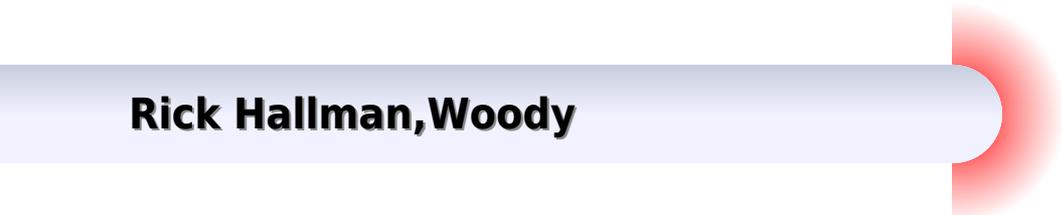

- 1. To observe the process of diffusion through a membrane.
- 2. To understand how a substance spreads from an area of high concentration to an area of low concentration.
- 3. To understand how a substance spreads from an area of high concentration to an area of low concentration.

Before you begin this activity, you should read the introduction and the procedure. You should also read the questions and the conclusion. You should also read the discussion and the evaluation. You should also read the reflection and the application. You should also read the extension and the challenge.
