

INTRODUCTION TO MODERN LINGUISTICS

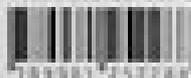

Linguistics has two major goals : (i) bringing our unconscious knowledge of language to the level of consciousness by familiarizing us with this linguistic knowledge, and (ii) studying how the different units of language are combined and how they operate in the human brain.

In general, linguistics is defined as the scientific study of language. Such a definition touches on the relationship between linguistics and other disciplines, namely psychology, sociology and philosophy, because language is linked to the study of the brain, society, thought, culture and knowledge of the world.

Linguistics, as the science of language, should be distinguished from the learning of individual languages. The layman is usually more familiar with the latter, in view of the fact that it has a central place in education and in everyday communication all over the world. This confusion is also ascribed to the fact that linguistics is a relatively new subject in the field of scholarship, although it has made significant headway in terms of the number of its students, teachers and researchers in the universities of both developed and developing countries.

Morocco is one of the few African and Arab countries where linguistics, as a scientific discipline, is growing rapidly, especially at the university level. Hundreds of BA monographs, and dozens of MAs and PhDs have been written on linguistics since the early 1970s.
