

Jacques Derrida: “Structure Sign and Play”

- Derrida’s endeavour is threefold:

- 1) to characterise certain features of the history of Western metaphysics based on the concept of “structure” and “centre”

- 2) to announce an “event”—a complex series of historical movements whereby these central notions were challenged, using structuralist anthropologist Levi-Strauss as an example

- 3) to suggest the ways in which current and future modes of thought and language might deploy and adapt Levi-Strauss’ insights in articulating their own relation to metaphysics

- The concept of structure that has dominated Western science and philosophy has always been referred to as a centre or point of reference, a fixed origin
- The function of such centre has been both to organise the structure and to limit the free play of terms and concepts within it, in other words, to foreclose such play
- The centre is the point at which any substitution or permutation of elements or terms is no longer possible
- Although the structure thereby depends on the centre, the centre itself is fixed and “escapes structurally,” since it is beyond the transformative reach of other elements in the structure
- Hence the centre is outside the structure and the very concept of a centered structure is only contradictorily coherent
- What it expresses is a desire for a “reassuring certitude” which stands beyond the subversive or threatening reach of any play which might disrupt the structure
