Abstract

The paper reports on a study which investigated Japanese and Taiwanese university students' perceptions of learner autonomy in English language learning. The study consists of two phases: a quantitative research in Phase One and a qualitative research in Phase Two. In Phase One, the authors conducted a survey of 902 students a revised version of the questionnaire developed previously. The objectives were to investigate the appropriateness of the instrument for a larger number of the students, perceptions of the students towards their responsibility in learning English, and gender differences in their attitudes towards English learning. In Phase Two, the authors conducted a survey of 73 students out of 902 students in Phase One another questionnaire in which they answered in an open-ended format in order to interpret the results of Phase One more deeply as well as to discover what effort teachers should do to have students get involved in class management. The results of the study proved that the revised instrument is reliable and appropriate. The authors found that individual students had a strong will to study English more and would like to get involved in different aspects of classroom management. The results of Phase Two suggest that the East Asian students are able to make good process to become autonomous learners if teachers help students develop their autonomy in various ways. We discuss "having students set a goal," "providing students with choices" and "considering individual differences" as some of the important roles to promote autonomy as a teacher.

Key words: learner autonomy, gender differences, class management

1. Literature Review

Learner autonomy has been a topic and a goal among language teachers along with the advent of communicative language teaching, but it still has room to be investigated and explored in East Asia in terms of students' taking responsibilities. Autonomy has been characterized in different ways, but Littlewood (1999) summarizes two main features of learner autonomy included in the definition proposed by previous researchers:

- Students should take responsibility for their own learning. This is both because all learning can in any case only be carried out by the students themselves and also because they need to develop the ability to continue learning after the end of their formal education.
- "Taking responsibility" involves learners in taking ownership (partial or total) of many processes
