Definition

The Structured Clinical Interview for Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM; SCID) is a widely used semi-structured interview intended to determine whether an individual meets criteria for any DSM disorder. The most recent versions of this measure parallel DSM-IV (American Psychiatric Association 1994) Axis I and II diagnoses (SCID-IV; First et al. 2002a) and DSM-5 (American Psychiatric Association 2013) diagnoses (SCID-5; First et al. 2015).

Historical Background

Development

The SCID was developed and piloted in the years following the publication of the DSM-III (c. 1980; Spitzer et al. 1992). Directly linked to the existing diagnostic criteria, the measure offers a way for clinicians to adhere to a set format while tailoring probes to the patient's understanding, asking additional questions to clarify differential diagnosis, and evaluating whether the description of a symptom offered by the patient aligns with the intent of the diagnostic criterion. The SCID has consistently included modules that reflect the range of currently recognized psychiatric diagnoses, including eating disorders.

The SCID can be used for multiple purposes: as part of intake procedures in clinical, forensic, or research evaluations; to select a study population; to describe a study population in terms of current and past psychiatric diagnoses; and to teach or improve the diagnostic interviewing skills of mental health professionals. Given these varied uses, different versions of the SCID-IV are available for researchers (First et al. 2002a), for clinicians (First et al. 1996), and for use with community samples (First et al. 2002b). Research, clinician, and clinical trial versions of the SCID-5 became available as of 2015 (<http://www.appi.org/pages/scid-5.aspx>).

Overall Content

The SCID assesses both current and lifetime diagnoses and prompts the interviewer to document age of illness onset and to rate current illness severity.
