Midterm Study Guide

Introduction to Sociology
Professor O'Connell

Spring
2018

1. What's the difference between population and sample?
  - Population: all the inhabitants of a particular town, area, or country.
  - Sample: representative of the population. Is often in surveys because it would be impractical and nearly impossible to survey the entire population. (Chapter 1 TB)
  - A population is the entirety of subjects intended to be studied that fall into the characteristics being studied. Populations are often not possible to study entirely so samples are taken. Samples are smaller subsets that are obtainable and available to study that are supposed to represent the population.
2. What's stratification? What are misconceptions about stratification?
  - Stratification is the ranking of the members of society into unequal classes or categories based on age, height, occupation, or another aspect of a person (Week 4 Lecture & Chapter 7 TB).
  - The people who have more resources represent the top layer of the social structure of stratification. Other groups, with progressively fewer and fewer resources, represent the lower layers of our society (Week 4 Discussion).
  - A separation based off differences often used in sociology as a categorization and often hierarchy based off factors such as wealth, income, race, and education. The misconception is that strata are merit based and that individuals can change their classification while in reality strata classification is often based of birth right. The way strata are created often gives little room for mobility between classifications
3. Conflict theory
  - Degree of stability in society is unstable. The fundamental relationship among the parts of society consists of competition, conflict, domination of the bourgeois (elite class), and subordination of the working, proletariat class to them.
  - Basic form of interaction is competition, not cooperation, which then leads to conflict and struggle.
  - Because groups of society and individuals are competing for power and resources, there isn't much social integration.
  - States that social change will only result from conflict among B.B. competing groups and as a result, tends to be abrupt and revolutionary. Believes that the institutional framework of society is the primary source of social problems, not the individual person (Chapter 2 TB).
  - Theory that structural inequalities are cause of stratification
