1. What is a trait, and how do traits differ from states? What does it mean to say that a trait is a disposition rather than an effect, even instantaneously?
 - a. A trait can be defined as a relatively stable psychological feature that is context-free. Traits are considered to be a part of the person, not the environment (i.e., experiences or situations). Traits are enduring qualities.
 - b. Traits are not all-or-none, but are dimensioned in continuous, measurable characteristics along which people differ in degree.
2. Why do traits considered to be a descriptive rather than an explanation of behaviour?
 - a. The traits defined themselves, as descriptive, because for us that particular system is the one that is being explained. One would be the one saying, "My anger is a function of anger, not."
3. What is latent variable used to identify trait dimensions that are not reflected with any measure?
 - a. The term latent is a technical term that refers to variables that are not directly measurable. Latent variables are defined as variables that are not directly measurable, but which are inferred from the observed variables. A latent variable is a variable that is not directly measurable, but which is inferred from the observed variables. The term latent variable is used to refer to a variable that is not directly measurable, but which is inferred from the observed variables.
4. What does it mean identifying the trait domain?
 - a. The identified domain is a set of related, but distinct, psychological variables that are used to identify the trait domain. The term domain is used to refer to a set of related, but distinct, psychological variables that are used to identify the trait domain.
5. Why is the three-factor model of personality generally preferred over Eysenck's and Costa's?
 - a. Eysenck's model is a two-factor model, and Costa's model is a three-factor model. The three-factor model is preferred because it is more comprehensive, and it is more consistent with the research on personality.
6. What are the Big Five traits and how have they been measured in individuals?
 - a. The Big Five traits are neuroticism, extraversion, openness, conscientiousness, and agreeableness. These traits are measured using self-report questionnaires.
7. What is the evidence that personality is relatively stable throughout adulthood?
