Practical Pharmaceutical Chemistry: Quantitative Analysis

A. M. Beckett, Chelsea College of Science and Technology, and J. R. Stoddart, Royal College of Science and Technology, Glasgow. University of London at the Athlone Press, 1962. viii + 578 pp. Figs. and tables 10 X 25.5 cm. $20.10

"Practical Pharmaceutical Chemistry" is a textbook on quantitative analysis of drugs for use in schools or colleges of pharmacy as well as by control chemists in pharmaceutical industry. This text breaks the subject matter into seventeen chapters which are as follows: I. Chemical Purity and Its Control; II. Technique of Quantitative Analysis; III. The theoretical Basis of Quantitative Analysis; IV. Acidimetry and Alkalimetry; V. Titration in Non-Aqueous Media; VI. Oxidation-Reduction Titrations; VII. Argentometric Titrations; VIII. Complexometric Analysis; IX. Miscellaneous Methods; X. Measurement of E.M.F. and pH; XI. Conductometric Titrations; XII. Practical Gravimetric Analysis; XIII. Solvent Extraction Methods; XIV. Emission Spectra and Their Analytical Applications; XV. The Theory of Absorption Spectra; XVI. Analytical Applications of Absorption Spectra; XVII. Principles of Polarography.

The areas listed above are very well covered in an easy-to-read and easy-to-understand style. Complete procedures are given for a great many drugs so that the method can then be applied to other chemicals in the same category.

The text possesses a knowledge of analytical balances as well as some background concerning the general physico-chemical principles upon which classical volumetric and gravimetric analysis are based. Although no mention is made of chromatographic methods, and infra-red and fluorescence spectroscopy are not covered, the common instrumentation methods are well covered. However, this is a good book for pharmacy students in drug assay and instrumentation analysis. The book is also of great value to chemists and pharmacists in private or governmental laboratories where drugs are analyzed. One drawback to the text is the lack of references.
