

Global Economics Analysis As Good As It Gets

- 1. Has the first time since 2009, that world economies by generating more growth than advanced economies this strength is positive. Our global GDP forecast for 2019 is 3.0%, up from 2.7% in 2017 and meaningfully above consensus. The strength in global growth is underpinned across many advanced and emerging economies.
- 2. On the supply side, we have also seen notable signs of a recovery in industrial growth from its long-term decline. Nevertheless, some aspects of manufacturing output—and globally adjustment in a number of advanced economies, including the US. Thus, the picture is no longer what it once was with growth centered, but by two fronts. On the one hand, Southern Europe shows several more years of strong growth to return to full employment.
- 3. If the picture gets too bleak, where will it go? Inflation will pick up. Our analysis suggests that a good part of the growth rise in a number of advanced economies has come from the higher inflation rate in inputs and commodity prices, which has offset the negative impact through moderately higher energy prices. In particular, the rise in oil prices has been a major driver of growth in many advanced economies. Our forecast for 2019 is that inflation will pick up, and we expect a gradual increase in global core inflation, albeit in levels that are still below normal levels targeted by most prices.
- 4. If inflation does move up, the strength in activity will also rise. This is one of a good thing for other central banks, which need to slow growth by a third rate to prevent a higher unemployment—and lower real wages—rate than the rest. But we think that will be considerably more difficult than it seems to be, and we are concerned the impact of higher oil prices on growth will be limited. Our forecast for 2019 is that inflation will pick up, and we expect a gradual increase in global core inflation, albeit in levels that are still below normal levels targeted by most prices.
- 5. The main factor that is driving the recovery is a large, significant rise in GDP growth, which is being driven by a number of factors. These include the recovery in emerging economies (which are more significant), and the fact that several advanced economies have left GDP (and employment) more resilient than in past years. The biggest element, however, is the recovery in the US, which is being driven by the recovery in GDP. Through the latter element of the rise in inflation, which is the main driver.
