

Chapter 1 Transition of Tokyo's Urban Planning

1 Transition of Laws and Regulations for Urban Planning

After the Great Ginza Fire of 1872, the Meiji Government issued a statement to build a fireproof city and built a Western-style brick quarter in Ginza. This was the first modern urban city building in Japan. Afterwards, the Tokyo Town Planning Ordinance – the origin of city planning legislation in Japan – was established in 1888. The Hibiya Park, Ueno Park and the road that runs along the Imperial Palace moat are legacies of the city development project at that time.

Then in 1919, the Tokyo Town Planning Ordinance was replaced by the City Planning Act. This was followed by the Imperial Capital Reconstruction Project after the 1923 Great Kanto Earthquake and a wide-scale land readjustment project, in which a significant part of the affected areas was developed by the method of city planning. Metros were also constructed, for the first time in Tokyo, between Asakusa and Ueno in 1927, Ueno and Shimbashi in 1934, and Shimbashi and Shibuya in 1939.

Although city planning and the relevant projects continued to be carried out, all such projects were discontinued by the end of the Pacific War due to the intensification.

In September 1946, the government enacted the Special City Planning Law for war-damage reconstruction. The first step towards the post-war reconstruction in Tokyo was made under the Tokyo Special City Plan (e.g. land readjustment for reconstruction) based on the Law. In June 1950, the Capital Construction Law was established in order to construct the capital city Tokyo under a national project. This Law, however, became difficult to respond sufficiently to the trends in enormous expansion of urban areas into the suburbs, which resulted in the establishment of the National Capital Region Development Act in April 1956 that was aimed for development from a cross-regional, capital-region perspective.

After that, the Tokyo Metropolitan Government (TMG) promoted all-out revision of urban plans: parks and green spaces in 1957, expressways in 1959, and high-speed railways in 1962.
