

Chapter 1 Politics

Politics: The struggle over who gets power and resources in society

What Is Politics?

- The Greek philosopher Aristotle said we are political animals, and as political animals we seem destined to remain.
- Political scientist Harold Lasswell defined politics as “who gets what, when, and how.”
- Power is the ability to get other people to do what you want them to do.
- The process through which we try to arrange our collective lives in some-kind of social order so that we can live without crashing into each other.
- What would a world without politics be like?
- Life would be constant conflict—what the philosopher Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679) called a “war of all against all.”
- Politics saves us from that fate.

Politics and Government

- Government is a system or organization for exercising authority over a body of people.
- American government is the Constitution and the institutions set up by the Constitution for the exercise of authority.
- Authority is power that citizens view as legitimate, or “right”—power to which we have implicitly consented.
 - Governments exercise authority because people recognize them as legitimate.

Rules and Institutions

- The rules and institutions of government have a profound effect on how power is distributed and who wins and loses in the political arena.
 - Rules are directives that determine how resources are allocated and how collective action takes place—they determine how we try to get the things we want.
 - Understanding the rules is crucial to understanding politics.
 - Institutions are the organizations where governmental power is exercised.
 - In the United States, rules provide for the institutions of a representatives of the people, and for a federal political system.
