

Categorical Data Analysis

Richard L. Scheaffer
University of Florida

The reference material and many examples for this section are based on Chapter 8, Analyzing Association Between Categorical Variables, from Statistical Methods for the Social Sciences, 3rd edition (Alan Agresti and Barbara Finlay, Prentice Hall). Alan Agresti, a statistics professor at the University of Florida, is one of the world's leading research authorities on categorical data analysis. Barbara Finlay is a sociologist at Texas A&M University.

The technique for analyzing categorical data that is most frequently taught in introductory statistics courses is the Chi-square test for independence. Consider the following two-way table that displays the results from a survey that Dr. Scheaffer asked his freshman and sophomore students to complete. The responses in the table are answers to the question, "Do you currently have a job?" Columns show the yes/no answers; rows show whether students were freshmen or sophomores.

		Do you currently have a job?
		No	Yes
Freshmen		25	12
Sophomores		11	14
		36	26

The χ^2 -value is 3.4, and the P-value is 0.065. What information do these numbers provide? Since the P-value is relatively small, many researchers would conclude that there is some association between job status and class. Does the chi-square value of 3.4 tell us anything more? Does the chi-square statistic tell us what we really want to know? Most likely what we really want to know about is the nature of the association. The chi-square value does not tell us anything at all about the nature of the association. In fact, the chi-square value tells us very little and is considered by many statisticians to be overused as a technique for analyzing categorical data. In this situation we can look directly at the data and conclude that sophomores have jobs at a higher rate than freshmen, but we do not get this information from the test results. The test tells us only that there is a relationship somewhere in the data. There are other techniques for analyzing categorical data that give us more information. In this situation, for example, we would like to look at the proportions to get additional information.

What we would like to have for categorical data analysis are techniques that give us useful information like we get from correlation and regression analysis for continuous data. Recall that the regression equation, in particular the slope from the regression equation, and the correlation value give us information we want to know. Once we have these values, we could
