personally interested in getting a general sense of interacting with the world, especially with other people

1. What is a trait, and how do traits differ from states? What does it mean to say that a trait is a disposition rather than an effect, even instantaneously?
 - a. A trait can be defined as a relatively stable psychological feature that is context-free. Traits are considered to be a part of the person, not the environment (i.e., experiences or situations). Traits are enduring qualities.
 - b. Traits are not all-or-none, but are dimensioned in continuous, measurable characteristics along which people differ in degree.
2. Why do traits considered to be a descriptive rather than an explanation of behaviour?
 - a. The traits defined themselves, as descriptive measures to see that someone behaves in a certain way in highly aggregated, often variable, but more enduring, "they engage in X because they appear to."
3. What is factor analysis used to identify what dimensions that are not understood about our world?
 - a. It is a method of analyzing patterns of correlations to seek to reveal statistically distinct groups, which make the and help make sense of those patterns. It starts by computing correlations to seek to show the correlation the study provides, and the group of variables. Then, the researcher is given variable performance scores, which tend to occur in the observed patterns of correlations. The factor and factor are not themselves or not if they actually are that dimension, the factor is and they are included in it another trait.
4. What does it mean identifying the trait domain?
 - a. The researcher takes a cluster of items, including personality traits in I/O and identify generalizations about it involving their traits in people. The item is then analyzed by results. It identified in different trait dimensions, and provide the I/O (personality) variables there.
5. Why is the three-factor model of personality generally preferred over Thurstone's and Cattell's?
 - a. Because Cattell's is overly complex and creates redundant factors. The three-factor model makes sense from a developmental, evolutionary, operational perspective, generalizing and more consistent.
6. What are the Big Five traits and how have they been measured in individuals?
 - a. The Big Five model consists of such a general term, but generally as a specific trait. Each dimension is thought to describe a set of all that the 5 traits are.
7. What is the evidence that personality is relatively stable throughout adulthood?
