

Chapter 1:

Why Use The Trips Formation?

Coaches at every level are always looking for an edge competitively over their opponents. The use of the trips formation has become a very popular way to gain an advantage by placing additional receivers to one side of the formation thus making the offensive formation unbalanced with receivers by having three on one side to just one or possibly two on the other side. This unbalance causes defenses to have to make a decision. They must decide to either adjust to the additional receiver and bring another defender over, or stay in their regular defensive alignment. This forced adjustment is the basis of what offensive coordinators are looking at and basing their schemes. If the defense does not adjust, then they will run pass plays that are designed to get one of the three receivers open. If they do adjust, then they are looking to either run the ball inside or pass the ball to the single receiver who does not have any help on the backside of the formation.
