

MODULE-6

STATICAL MECHANICS

Up to the end of seventeenth century, all the observed physical phenomena were explained by using either ordinary laws of mechanics or laws of electromagnetism. But with the help of these ordinary laws, systems with many particles can't be handled due to mathematical complications. Moreover, in the last decade of seventeenth century there were some ground-breaking experiments, such as black-body radiation, which needed new theories for their explanation. As a result of these needs quantum theory came. When this theory ties its knot with statistics, we get a new branch of physics known as Statistical Mechanics capable of explaining the physical behaviour of all the systems whether composed of a single particle or composed of a large number of particles.

Statistical mechanics is basically a formalism that aims at explaining the observed physical properties of matter in bulk on the basis of dynamical behaviour of its microscopic constituents. It is applicable to any physical system in any state whatsoever. It is not concerned with the actual motion of the particles constituting a system; rather it investigates some average or most probable properties of the system without going through detail description of the constituent particles. It is noteworthy about statistical mechanics that the larger is the number of particles in a mechanical system, the more correct are the statistical predictions about the system and vice-versa. Before starting the various formalisms in statistical mechanics, let us discuss a few general considerations regarding the statistical nature of a macroscopic (observable with naked eyes) system.

7.1 Concept of energy levels and energy states

Consider a  $H_2$  atom, which has the simplest atomic configuration with a single electron revolving round the nucleus. The total energy of such an electron is given by $-\frac{m e^4}{8 \epsilon_0 h^2 n^2}$ , where  $m$  and  $e$  are mass and charge of the electron respectively,  $\epsilon_0$  is the permittivity of free-space,  $h$  is the Planck's constant and  $n$  is known as principal quantum number. Thus the total energy for such an electron solely depends on  $n$ . We know that for a given value of  $n$ , we get other three quantum numbers whose values depend on  $n$  in the following manner:

$m_s$  (magnetic spin quantum number) =  $-\frac{1}{2}, +\frac{1}{2}$  (for each value of  $m_l$ )

All  $n, l, m_l$  integers or zero.

A specific energy level corresponds to a specific value of  $n$ . For different integral values of  $n$ , we get different discrete energy levels. On the other hand, each discrete set of the four quantum numbers, i.e.  $\{n, l, m_l, m_s\}$ , designates each energy state. Let's have an example to make these concepts clear.

Consider  $n = 2$  energy level. For  $n = 2, l = 0, 1$ .
