CHAPTER SUMMARY

What Is the "Sociological Imagination"?

- Sociology is the systematic study of human societies, with special emphasis on modern, industrialized systems. Sociologists attempt to understand the far-reaching changes that have occurred in human societies over the past two to three centuries. Social scientists recognize that these seemingly "personal troubles", if occurring in patterned ways to large numbers of individuals, reflect important "public issues" or consequences of social structures to make the process of structuration.
- Major social changes have also occurred in the most intimate and personal characteristics of people's lives, or at the "micro" level. The development of romantic love as a basis for marriage is an example of this.
- The practice of sociology involves developing a sociological imagination - the ability to think imaginatively and to detach oneself from preconceived ideas about social relationships.

What Theories Do Sociologists Use?

- Sociologists use a wide range of theoretical approaches. Theoretical disputes are difficult to resolve even in the natural sciences, and in sociology we face special difficulties because of the complex problems involved in subjecting our own behavior to study.
- Important figures in the early development of sociological theory include Auguste Comte (1798–1857), Herbert Spencer (1820–1903), Émile Durkheim (1858–1917), Karl Marx (1818–1883), and Max Weber (1864–1920). Many of their ideas remain influential in sociology today. The work of sociologists Harriet Martineau (1802–1876), and W. E. B. Du Bois (1868–1963) – though unacknowledged during their lifetimes – deserves a place alongside the classical sociologists.
- The main theoretical approaches in sociology are symbolic interactionism, functionalism, Marxism, feminism and feminism theory, and postmodernism. These theories complement each other, yet major contrasts exist between them; these differences influence the ways in which theoretical issues are handled by the adherents of the different approaches.
- The study of face-to-face interaction is usually called microsociology. By contrast, macrosociology involves the study of larger groups, institutions, and social systems. Micro and macro analyses are interrelated and complement one other.

What Kinds of Questions Can Sociologists Answer?

- Sociologists investigate social life by posing clearly defined questions and investigating the answers via systematic research. These questions may be factual, comparative, developmental, or theoretical.
