ABSTRACT

An exercise in a course on signal processing techniques for students was the motivation to report some of the procedures on signal recovery capability so that other students can, perhaps, use them as an introduction to data analysis. This paper illustrates some of the procedures that can be used easily in order to extract "signal" and "noise" from a set of data. The rather unconventional dataset of the publication record with time of one of the authors has been used, and under specific assumptions for the set of data, smoothing routines were applied using 5, 7, 9, and 11-point running average smoothers. For the original and the smoothed data, the power spectra were calculated. Significant peaks at certain periods are observed irrespective of the smoothing procedure and presumably record historical event periods of some importance. In this example, the Blackman-Tukey theorem is employed regarding signal and noise resolution. The estimates of signal and noise power were integrated over the total frequency range to obtain a statistically stable estimate of the "signal", indicating that about 85% of the data are robust to variations in the processing techniques used.

INTRODUCTION

As part of a course on signal processing techniques for students, one of the exercises was to take a provided record of data with time and to produce an assessment of whether the record contains a signal. The methods used were up to the discretion of each student but were to be quantified, and their assumptions and weaknesses noted and used to ensure a quantitatively accurate rendition of signal in the given record. As basic references for the students, the course used Davis (1986), Mendoe (1984), and Yarus and Chambers (1994), with ancillary references to journals being provided for a more comprehensive understanding of the subject (such as Geophysics, Proceedings of the IEEE, IEEE Signal Processing Magazine, Journal of Geoscience Education, Journal of Geophysical Research)

It occurred to us that it might be a good idea to record some of the procedures so that other students can obtain an idea of signal recovery capability with particular techniques. All the computer programs used are available free from the World Wide Web, so that there is virtually no cost involved in setting up the exercise or in its execution. The biggest problem is to provide a data set that has a "real" meaning, rather than, say, a data set that describes scientific measurements but for which the average student might have no understanding of what the data are supposed to represent physically.

To circumvent such different levels of understanding of different areas of science, the students were provided with the publication record with time of one of the authors (I.L.). This data set is something the students can immediately relate to as being "real", and also something that represents an on-going scientific report card of the various ups-and-downs in the scientific life of one individual (see later for a brief historical accounting of these peaks and valleys). This record of data was then to be examined using signal processing techniques for "signal" and "noise". We report here on those efforts.

TECHNICAL ASSUMPTIONS AND METHODS

The Data Base - The data were presented to the students in terms of the number of publications per year, as shown in figure 1. Note that this limitation means it is impossible to analyze the data on a timescale finer than a year (such would be possible if the actual dates of publication of each article had been used and not just the publication year). Because whole numbers of calendar years were used rather than fractional (so one counts publications in 1965, 1966, etc., rather than 1965.3-1966.3, 1966.3-1967.3, etc), then one already has some sort of bias in the data used on a year scale-length because of the arbitrary choice of integer year counting (this bias is removable by taking actual publication dates of articles rather than just the year of publication).

However, given the time constraints for the class, it was decided not to pursue this refinement of the data. It would have taken just too long to obtain the exact publication dates (day, month, year) for over 630 articles, some in rather obscure journals. So the basis for further signal processing manipulations was the data portrayed in figure 1. As an aside, because the students had the publications list, and because of the innate curiosity of students, they also plotted the publications by broad subject categories as shown in figure 2. A major shift from the category "Astrophysics" to the category
