

Lecture 1 – Introduction to Animal Physiology

What is Animal Physiology

- Animal physiologists study processes that operate in living organisms at all levels, ranging from cells to whole organisms. This includes functions of tissues and organ systems
- Physiologists also study the regulation of processes within groups of cells and how the combined activity of cells affects the function of the animal
- How do cells/tissues/systems all integrate to produce function?
- Animal physiology is really an integrative science - it brings together everything known about an animal's structure/function and regulation of animal function (eg by hormones and/or nerves) so that we can understand how that animal operates in its environment

Animal Physiology

- Physiology processes are usually regulated
 - Homeostasis maintains internal consistency
 - Negative feedback loops helps maintain homeostasis
 - Positive feedback loops generate explosive responses
- In some cases, animals have "adaptations" of their structure or function which enables them to survive in very extreme conditions
- This has led to the concept that individuals "adapt" to particular environmental constraints and demands, and that "adaptation" is part of the natural selection process and evolution
- Not all differences are adaptations AND phenotypic changes may occur in an individual in response to environmental change which are not due to evolutionary changes

Adaptions; Acclimatisation; adaption

Environments are not static and so an animal's physiology will also respond to changes in their environment

Types of "adaptation" vary:

- acclimatization / acclimation
- adaptation

Acclimatization/acclimation

A physiological change can occur in an individual resulting from chronic exposure to a new naturally occurring or artificial environmental condition

- Immediate increase in lung ventilation rate, e.g. faster breathing
- Acquire more O₂ in the high-altitude atmosphere
- After a few days, ventilation returns to the rate it was at sea level (reversible). Other mechanisms that facilitate gaseous exchange at high altitude start to operate
- They are said to have acclimatized/ acclimated to high-altitude conditions
- The same response occurs when an animal is placed in an artificially controlled environment to mimic high-altitude conditions
