

2.4 INORGANIC COMPOUNDS AND SOLUTIONS

OBJECTIVES

- Describe the properties of water and those of inorganic acids, bases, and salts.
- Distinguish among solutions, colloids, and suspensions.
- Define pH and explain the role of buffer systems in homeostasis.

Most of the chemicals in your body exist in the forms of compounds. Biologists and chemists divide these compounds into two principal classes: inorganic compounds and organic compounds. Inorganic compounds usually lack carbon and are structurally simple. Their molecules also have only a few atoms and cannot be used by cells to perform complicated biological functions. They include water and many salts, acids, and bases. Inorganic compounds may have either ionic or covalent bonds. Water makes up 55–60% of a lean adult's total body mass; all other inorganic compounds combined add 1–2%. Examples of inorganic compounds that contain carbon are carbon dioxide (CO_2), bicarbonate ion (HCO_3^-), and carbonic acid (H_2CO_3). Organic compounds always contain carbon, usually contain hydrogen, and always have covalent bonds. Most are large molecules and many are made up of long chains of carbon atoms. Organic compounds make up the remaining 38–43% of the human body.

Water

Water is the most important and abundant inorganic compound in all living systems. Although you might be able to survive for weeks without food, without water you would die in a matter of days. Nearly all the body's chemical reactions occur in a watery medium. Water has many properties that make it such an indispensable compound for life. We have already mentioned the most important property of water, its polarity—the uneven sharing of valence electrons that confers a partial negative charge near the one oxygen atom and two partial positive charges near the two hydrogen atoms in a water molecule (see Figure 2.5c). This property alone makes water an excellent solvent for other ionic or polar substances, gives water molecules cohesion (the tendency to stick together), and allows water to resist temperature changes.

Water as a Solvent

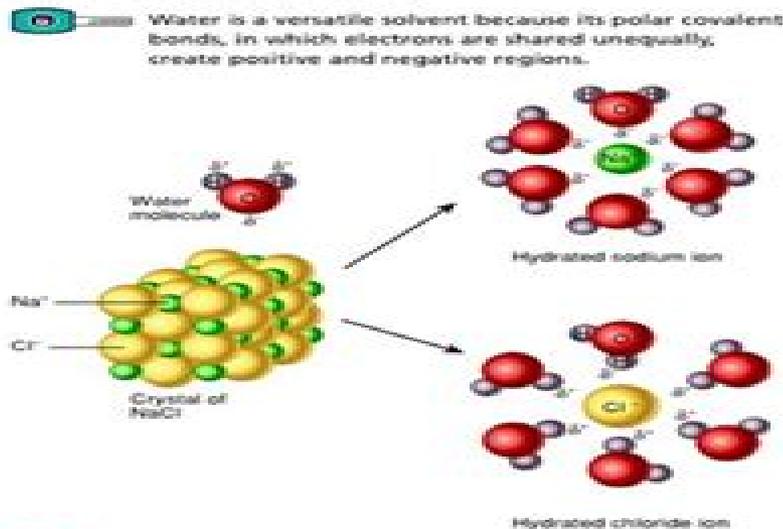

In medieval times people searched in vain for a “universal solvent,” a substance that would dissolve all other materials. They found nothing that worked as well as water. Although it is the most versatile solvent known, water is not the universal solvent sought by medieval alchemists. If it were, no container could hold it because it would dissolve all potential containers! What exactly is a solvent? In a solution, a substance called the solvent dissolves another substance called the solute. Usually there is more solvent than solute in a solution. For example, your sweat is a dilute solution of water (the solvent) plus small amounts of salts (the solutes).

The versatility of water as a solvent for ionized or polar substances is due to its polar covalent bonds and its bent shape, which allows each water molecule to interact with several neighboring ions or molecules. Solutes that are charged or contain polar covalent bonds are hydrophilic (hydro- = water; -philic = loving), which means they dissolve easily in water. Common examples of hydrophilic solutes are sugar and salt. Molecules that contain mainly nonpolar covalent bonds, by contrast, are hydrophobic (-phobic = fearing). They are not very water soluble. Examples of hydrophobic compounds include animal fats and vegetable oils.

To understand the dissolving power of water, consider what happens when a crystal of a salt such as sodium chloride (NaCl) is placed in water (Figure 2.10). The electronegative oxygen

Figure 2.10 How polar water molecules dissolve salts and polar substances. When a crystal of sodium chloride is placed in water, the slightly negative oxygen end (red) of water molecules is attracted to the positive sodium ions (Na^+), and the slightly positive hydrogen portions (gray) of water molecules are attracted to the negative chloride ions (Cl^-). In addition to dissolving sodium chloride, water also causes it to dissociate, or separate into charged particles, which is discussed shortly.

? Table sugar (sucrose) easily dissolves in water but is not an electrolyte. Is it likely that all the covalent bonds between atoms in table sugar are nonpolar bonds? Why or why not?
