

Part 2 Exploratory Data Analysis

Chapter 3 Describing Data: Numeric

Descriptive Statistics

Outcomes

Summary tables (pivot tables) and graphs provide a broad overview of the profile of random variables. However, more specific numeric measures are required. These are provided by a set of numeric measures called descriptive statistics. These statistics identify the location, spread and shape of the data. In this chapter they will be explained and the conditions under which each would be appropriate to describe sample data will also be reviewed.

After studying this chapter, you should be able to:

- describe the various central and non-central location measures
- calculate and interpret each of these location measures
- describe the appropriate central location measure for different data types
- describe the various measures of spread (or dispersion)
- calculate and interpret each measure of dispersion
- describe the concept of skewness
- calculate and interpret the coefficient of skewness
- calculate the five-number summary table and construct its box plot
- explain how outliers influence the choice of valid descriptive statistical measures.
