

1: The Hitchhiking Game

by Milan Kundera

Everybody plays and nobody wins

The needle on the gauge suddenly slipped toward zero and the young driver of the sports car declared that it was reaching low enough gas for the car to stop. "See that we don't run out of gas again," protested the girl, and reminded the driver of several places where this had already happened to them. The young man replied that he wasn't worried, because whenever he went through with her had the charm of adventure for him. The girl objected; whenever they had run out of gas on the highway it had, she said, always been an adventure only for her. The young man had babies and she had had to make it up for her babies by thinking a rick and letting herself be driven to the nearest gas station, then thinking a rick back with a can of gas. The young man asked the girl whether the drivers who had given her a rick had been handsome, since she spoke as if her luck had been a hardship. She replied (with awkward hesitations) that sometimes they had been very pleasant, but that it hadn't done her any good as she had been frustrated with the car and had had to turn them before she could get anything going.

"Yes," said the young man. The girl protested that she wasn't a pig, but that he was, and hence her many girls stopped him on the highway when he was driving the car alone!

The young man put his arms around the girl's shoulders and looked her gently in the forehead. He knew that she loved him and that she was jealous. Jealous isn't a pleasant quality, but, apart from its inconveniences, there's something beautiful about it. At least that's what the young man thought.

Because he was only twenty-eight, it seemed to him that he was old and knew everything that a man could know about women. In the heady-five-year-old girl sitting beside him he spotted precisely what, until now, he had not with heart or sensory purity.

The needle was so empty when the young man caught sight of a sign announcing that a station was a quarter of a mile ahead. The girl hardly had time to say her injured she was before the young man was reversing and driving into a space in front of the pumps. He had to stop a little way off, because beside the pumps was a large gasoline truck refilling the pumps.

"We'll have to wait," said the young man to the girl, and got out of the car. "How long will it take?" he demanded in the usual invariable. "Only a moment," replied the attendant, and the young man went. "I've heard that you follow!" He wanted to go back and sit in the car, but he saw that the girl had gotten out the other side. "I'll take a little walk in the meantime," she said. "Where to?" the young man asked, wanting to see the girl's embarrassment.

He had known her for a year now, but she would still get shy in front of him. He enjoyed her moments of shyness, partly because they distinguished her from the women he'd met before, partly because the girl's shyness was a precious thing to him.

The girl really didn't like it when the young man would drive for several hours without stopping; she had to ask him to stop for a moment somewhere near a change of trees, the always get angry when, with helpful surprise, he would ask her why he should stop. She knew that her shyness was infectious and self-fueled. She often longed to feel free and easy about her body, the way most of the women around her did. She had even invented a special device for self-examination: she would repeat to herself that at least every human being received one out of millions of available bodies, so she would receive an allotted piece out of the infinite chain in an enormous hotel. The body was therefore beautiful and impressive, a ready-made, heavenly thing. She would repeat this to herself in different ways, but she could never manage to feel it.

The experiment this time coming to her relations with the young man, whom she had known for a year and with whom she was happy, perhaps because he never separated her body from her soul and she could live with him wholly. In this world there was happiness, but right behind the happiness lurked suspicion, and the girl was full of that. For instance, it often occurred to her that other women (like the nanny's assistant) were more attractive and more seductive and that the young man, who did not conceal the fact that he knew this kind of woman well, would someday leave her for a woman like that. (True, the young man declared that he'd had enough of them to last his whole life, but she knew that he was much younger than he thought.) She wanted him to be completely hers and she wanted to be completely his, but it often seemed that the more she tried to give him something, the more she denied him something—the very thing that a superficial love or a flirtation gives to a person. It occurred her that she was not able to combine seriousness with lightheartedness.

But now the nanny's worrying and gay work thoughts were far from her mind. She felt good. It was the best day of their annual two-week vacation. The sky was blue like whole year she had been wondering whether the sky would really be blue, and he was beside her. At his, "Where to?" she blushed, and left the car without a word. She walked around the gas station. About a hundred yards away, a road began. She set off for it,
