

Advanced Statistical Methods in Epidemiology

Practical 3

Modelling with Covariates: Case Studies and Examples

Logistic Regression

The data to be analysed in this part of the practical was taken from a literature review by Colditz et al. published in JAMA (1974) on the efficacy of the BCG vaccine in prevention of tuberculosis (TB). Data from 13 independent studies is available in Stata datafile `BCG_TB_meta.dta`.

The variable `TB_case` has value 1 if an individual develops TB (is a case) and has value 0 if an individual does not develop TB.

The variable `Intervention` has value 1 if an individual was vaccinated against TB and is 0 otherwise.

The dataset also records `Year` of the studies and the `Latitude` at which each study was conducted. `Latitude` represents the variation in rainfall, humidity and environmental mycobacteria suspected of producing immunity against TB.

- 1) Analyze the data by study, taking `TB_case` as response and `Intervention` as exposure. Use Mantel-Haenszel within stratum weights.

To do this, use the following syntax:

- `es TB_Case Intervention [fweight = frequency], by(study)`

OR follow the steps below:

- Statistics → Epidemiology and related → Tables for epidemiologists → Cohort study risk ratio (etc)
- Specify `TB_case` as case variable and `Intervention` as exposed variable.
- Specify the variable `frequency` as weights, and under options stratify on `study` and select "Use Mantel-Haenszel".
- Click Submit.

You should get the table shown in Lecture 9.

- 2) Analyze the data accounting for the effects of latitude and year of study by fitting a logistic model with `TB_case` as response and `Intervention` as exposure.
