As the money supply increases, aggregate demand shifts right from being a horizontal or near horizontal line to a downward-sloping line. The horizontal line represents the aggregate demand curve's behavior in a world of perfect capital markets. The aggregate demand curve shifts right from being a horizontal line to a downward-sloping line because there are two reasons. First, there is an increase in the amount of money that aggregate demand uses to buy goods and services. Second, the increase in the amount of money that aggregate demand uses to buy goods and services is accompanied by an increase in the price level. These two increases in aggregate demand are the result of the increase in the money supply. The aggregate demand curve shifts right from being a horizontal line to a downward-sloping line.
