

Chapter 9: Cellular Respiration and Fermentation

Important Background

- Cells get their energy from the nucleotide, Adenosine Triphosphate (ATP)
  - Key characteristics of ATP:
    - ATP has high potential energy (PE) → this means ATP is unstable and thus, can't be stored
      - Cells only contain enough ATP to last a few mins of normal activity
    - ATP production is fast → cells are constantly making new ATP all the time
  - ATP is made from the energy that is stored in the sugar Glucose
  - Glucose is made via Photosynthesis
    - Glucose is a high-energy molecule → aka, it contains a lot of chemical energy
      - "RECALL: "chemical energy" refers to PE that's stored within chemical bonds
      - So you can think of glucose as a molecule that stores high amounts of energy, which can potentially be used to drive other cellular processes (like ATP synthesis)
    - Glucose monomers can be synthesized into polymers such as Starch & Glycogen
      - Starch & glycogen are called "storage carbohydrates" because they contain glucose + all of it's stored energy
      - Metabolic pathways (discussed in this chapter) break these storage carbohydrates down into their glucose monomers → releases all the stored chemical energy
      - The released energy is then used to transfer a phosphate group to Adenosine Diphosphate (ADP), thus generating ATP
- *REMEMBER: The prefix refers to the # of inorganic phosphorus (P) atoms:
 "di" = 2 P (as in ADP)
 "tri" = 3 P (as in ATP)

9.1 Overview of Cellular Respiration

- Glucose = most common source of energy → plants/animals store glucose & oxidize it to provide chemical energy in the form of ATP
- Storage carbohydrates (like starch & glycogen) act like a "savings account" for chemical energy, and ATP is like cash
- To withdraw chemical energy from the savings, storage carbohydrates must be hydrolyzed (broken down) into their glucose monomers
- Glucose is then oxidized through a series of controlled redox reactions. The released free energy is used to synthesize ATP via:
  - CELLULAR RESPIRATION
  - FERMENTATION

**Difference between these 2 processes:
 The degree to which they oxidize glucose*
- Fermentation does NOT fully oxidize glucose
  - Instead, fermentation produces small reduced organic molecules which are released as waste from the cell
- Cellular respiration completely oxidizes glucose into carbon dioxide (CO<sub>2</sub>) and water
  - *Cellular respiration releases MORE ENERGY than fermentation! This means more energy is released when glucose is FULLY oxidized (as in C.R.) compared to when it is only PARTIALLY oxidized (as in fermentation)
