Kirk-Polarization Cell

The Kirk cell is an electrochemical device which normally consists of electrochemical cells which are connected in series. The cells are connected in series to ground in a configuration which, for reasons of convenience, may not be provided for most instruments. The cell has a low resistance to the passage of AC current while blocking DC current.

The Kirk cell consists of multiple pairs of porous silver plates which are immersed in a 50% potassium hydroxide electrolyte solution. An AC lead leading to the electrolyte prevents evaporation. Absorption of atmospheric gases and excessive heating under high current flow. The cell blocks direct current up to a limit voltage of 1.2 V. Maximum direct voltage on the plates should not higher than 50V. Porous silver plates, causing 50% of oxygen gas to form on the positive plate. Hydrogen gas on the negative plate. The internal resistance of the Kirk cell is thereby reduced and the direct current flows through the cell. AC current is conducted by the low resistance plate-condenser effect of the cell.

The cell has to be treated in well-ventilated locations, protected from sunlight and rain.

Should the liquid level be maintained within the marked lines, the cell can be conveniently used in ambient temperatures between 40°C and -20°C. The cell can be stored sealed according to the technical conditions section 1 year.
